Drinks At The PM's Anyone?

2025 SA

Beneath this story are the unanswered questions about the Not-So-Deadly virus

1 This story has been in the pipeline for some weeks and it shows every sign now of getting a thoroughly good airing. It's about the PM and his staff at his No.10 residence - and across the departments at Westminster - meeting for drinks and frivolity.

2 Nothing wrong with that in principle - since works parties are all about good relations, appreciation and letting one's hair down with one's colleagues - assuming they are deserving of it

3 And maybe, the staff at No.10 and wider afield were deserving of it. But the point is, as the entire nation will be aware now - thanks to the explosive frontpage headlines of almost every major news platform - THAT party was badly timed.

For the party on 20may21 was held during the nation's official lockdown - a lockdown dictated to the nation by the very people at No.10 on the 20may21, when they were swigging drinks and digging into their picnics for supper.

One person referred to it as an insult. That would be putting things lightly. Not only will this be seen as an insult - it will be seen as contempt for the people of Britain - since the rules they set for the likes of us - are not set for the likes of THEM.
Oh no!

But, people of Britain - there is a bigger issue here which is in danger of being missed altogether, since it is not so obvious to many. And it is this.

At the centre of government in the UK - which this is - where the undiluted hard facts of this pandemic are at their most concentrated, there was on the 20may21 a complete dismissal of the threat of a virus and the very fear which the government has attached to it for injection into us, the people.

4 Why was there no fear among the party goers we might ask? Could it be that the PM perhaps - and all the staff - knew the risk was nothing like they said it was?

5 This is what Principia Scientific wrote in an article:

Govts Admit Using 'Mass Formation Psychosis' For Population Control

The London Telegraph reported the comments made by Members of the Scientific Pandemic Influenza Group on Behaviour (SPI-B), a subcommittee of the Scientific Advisory Group for Emergencies (SAGE) the government's chief scientific advisory group.

The report quotes a briefing from March 2020, as the first lockdown was decreed, that stated the government should drastically increase "the perceived level of personal threat" that the virus poses because "a substantial number of people still do not feel sufficiently personally threatened".

The unnamed scientist adds that "The way we have used fear is dystopian."

The scientist further confessed that "The use of fear has definitely been ethically questionable. It's been like a weird experiment. Ultimately, it backfired because people became too scared."

Another separate scientist on the subcommittee professed "You could call psychology 'mind control'. That's what we do - clearly we try and go about it in a positive way, but it has been used nefariously in the past."

Another scientist warned that "We have to be very careful about the authoritarianism that is creeping in," adding "people use the pandemic to grab power and drive through things that wouldn't happen otherwise."

According to the report, another researcher with the group acknowledged that "Without a vaccine, psychology is your main weapon," adding that "Psychology has had a really good epidemic, actually."

Yet another scientist on the subcommittee stated that they have been "stunned by the weaponisation of behavioural psychology" over the past year and warned that "psychologists didn't seem to notice when it stopped being altruistic and became manipulative."

"They have too much power and it intoxicates them", the scientist further warned.

It cannot be traced now, but a year ago, the full list of members on the SAGE committee was on a government website. It was pointed out at the time the weight of specialists on the committee was potentially alarming. It showed that instead of the weight being towards virologists, immunologists epidemiologists and other science and medically orientated experts, the weight was in favour of psychologists and behaviourists. Hmm. Just what you need at a time such as this. Some yes – I would concede, but not a heavy weighting towards.

SAGE appears to have been more about mind control at that point in time – and possibly still is. It certainly feels like it – weighing up all the narrative from around the world as I and others are prone to do.

6 Of course, there is a risk to health from this virus – and few would deny that. People have gone in to hospital and many have died in ICU. PM Johnson has openly said as much. The thing is - many scientists and doctors around the world would accuse Johnson of lying about the actual cause of the deaths.

Not all the patients who have died have died of Covid. Many if not most, it is suggested, have died with Covid – which paints a different picture.

Patients in hospital ICUs have died - we understand – because they have been given entirely the wrong protocols. The patients have been denied drugs which would have seen them bounce out of hospital within a few days.

Take for example Kate Dalley. Kate tells her own story, but there are countless others concerning the fights families have with hospital staff over the treatment of their loved ones.

Take a look at this article – again by Principia Scientific:

7 But let's return to the story this week.

On Wednesday, PM Johnson - in PMQs - cut a sheepish fellow with his tail between his legs. In a carefully prepared speech, he came clean to MPs and the nation and admitted – “he thought the party was in fact a meeting”. Have a listen to his remarks to the House during Prime Ministers Questions.

It would have been a massive meeting had all 100 of the invitees joined him – per the leaked email - rather than the 30 or so who actually did.

Chris Bryant MP – Labour - could see through the PM's mist and asked the PM how stupid does he think the British people are?

Sir Keir Starmer MP was the first to respond to the PM's excuses and in a manor quite expected – asked, will the PM do the decent thing and resign?

Ian Blackford MP -SNP - went a tad further and suggested that the Tory backbenchers should put pressure on the PM to do exactly that - resign.

Ed Davey MP – leader of the LibDems waded in too of course.

8 All the above is about one party in May of last year. But as readers will be aware – there were more parties than just this one,

This BBC article refers to nine and my guess is that that number is probably a gross understatement – believing there to be many more.

For example, Simon Case – Cabinet Secretary at No.10 – was charged with the task of investigating the Christmas parties at No.10 held last December. He quickly resigned because the man had organised his own staff parties and was bound to be found out. Sue Gray took over the task and is in the frame now with the poisoned chalice.

What answer could she possibly come up with? A whitewash will be seen through. If she points the finger at the PM and senior staff, then that will be exceptionally costly for a lot of people in post – including the PM. And if she did – or does – then a police investigation should be next. The police are sat on their hands right now waiting to see what they are told to do – and doubtless hoping it will all just go away. Of course, if we had a political system in the UK which set politicians apart from justice - instead of owning justice – then the police would have been in before now and PM Johnson and all the party goers would be waiting to hear their sentence. Another one of those changes to come in the near future!

The prediction is that she will not conclude anything – since she will not get that far in the process.

- 9 Speaking of predictions – here's a bold one and one probably shared with millions tonight around the whole country. PM Johnson will end his reign this week and the current chancellor – a bit later - will be elected the new PM.

The act of PM Johnson being persuaded to fall on his own sword will give the government a small measure of credibility with some people seeing that the party can cut out its own cancer. Tory backbenchers already thinking about their seats, will have decided to trade a Big Hitter - as is their current leader – for the chance of a new start with the people of this nation.

The thing is – that will not be the end of it. There is another matter to be understood. It is the matter of understanding the real reason for the Covid FEAR campaign in the first place – which was the substitute for what could have been a real pandemic that actually killed people in horrific numbers - like they tell us it does – but it doesn't – according to the evidence.

PM Johnson has now shown himself as not just economical with the truth – but a serial liar. And the habit of liars – is to lie! What I sense we are all going to be learning over the coming weeks and months, is the true extent of those lies. And here I am not referring to Boris Johnson. I refer to the government and its advisors and their handling of the whole Covid affair. Some people will already be thinking about a truly major political crash landing. The words BRACE-BRACE-BRACE come to my mind.

- 10 Personally, I'm happy with a political crash and on the widest scale possible. I myself am apolitical and have no allegiance to any politician or their party. That view is underlined by the fact that there has been a total absence of intelligent debate in parliament – let alone opposition - over the last two years on Covid alone. I personally favour a complete stripping out of the system and starting afresh with something never seen before. But that discussion is for later.

After the Theresa May debacle - and her mishandling of the Brexit affair - Boris was, for a time, a breath of fresh air. He had a look about him which suggested he could in fact be solid. That said, there were many in his past who thought very differently – accusing him of lying about absolutely anything, if it suited him. And there we have it.

The man lies. Take a look at this article by the Daily Expose.

Boris Johnson hasn't just Lied about Parties; He's also Lied about 90% of Covid-19 ICU patients being Unvaccinated.

It seems lying is in his nature. But I truly believe he is not alone in that place. And many I believe will think so too. So, so many have lied about the pandemic as we are all coming to understand – and all so clearly now. The question hanging from the gallows is - what are we all to do about it?

PS1 UK Column is running a series on Covid lies. The article is:
