German Propaganda

Is the BBC now adopting German propaganda tactics?

- 1 Some years ago, everyone had a clear idea of what the term "German Propaganda" meant. The Germans in WW2 were well practiced in the art and history has recorded to what effect.
- 2 With tongue in cheek, I have borrowed the term and the meaning, to apply to another situation - but this time in the current day. At this time, in the current day, it applies to my favourite German.
- 3 The truth is – and no shame felt – I have always had an interest in top league football if only from a distance. These days that means confining that interest to just listening and reading – since I have long lost interest in the content of mainstream TV. A full life schedule prevents it anyway.

I also have an intrinsic interest in people management, which is why I enjoy listening to one particular team manager over many others. That is, listening to what he says about his team and much more. My favourite manager to listen to is Jurgen Klopp - Manager of Liverpool FC - and he's German.

I am inclined to believe that anyone would be hard pressed to find a more honest sounding, gentle, sensitive and gracious person in all the country. But I am not blind to the point that he is manager of a top flight successful football team – which may mean - that behind dressing room doors – he is not quite the image which would match my own of him.

I'm prepared to hold an element of doubt on this – but like anyone else – he's not guilty until proven otherwise – and no one is looking to prove otherwise.
- 4 So, what's this all about then?

Well, I have been stunned yet again by the nature of reporting - which seems to know no limits - when it comes to the reporting One-Sided stories. Here I am referring to the BBC article last weekend on the subject of vaccinations and how my favourite German views them and the situation for others.
- 5 The BBC report is headed "Jurgen Klopp: Liverpool manager says vaccine is 'not a limit on freedom'"

Immediately, I took issue with this. The reason being, is that many people across the UK are learning they are being coerced into having the vaccination whether they want it or not. The government have repeatedly said that if we want to travel then we are going to be required to be jabbed. That means either succumb to taking the jab or suffer a regime of testing and isolation – in effect, as a penalty for not complying with the government's wishes - to get the jab.

We have recently learned that care-workers will be sacked this November if they don't take it. NHS workers will be faced with a similar ultimatum in the New Year – that is, unless there is a massive kick-back which makes the government think again.

The situation in Australia, around this subject of coercion is horrific – but I'm not going there today.

Please do not believe for one minute that I am attacking my favourite German. We are still firm mates and I accept we are all entitled to our own opinions. How Jurgen arrives at his, is truly his own affair. Clearly, he feels that there is nothing potentially wrong with the jab - given all that's been said and not said on the BBC – taking note of what the BBC have quoted him as saying about his view.

6 I personally believe Jurgen Klopp is wrong on his assessment. People left, right and centre are losing their own freedom of choice to decide for themselves whether to be jabbed or not. This pressure by the government appears all too clear to me – supported if not reinforced by the one tone message we get from the government's spokespersons and its retained PR department, that is the BBC.

7 That said, Freedom of Choice is not the main point behind this article. The point I wish to cover begins here. Here I make specific reference to the BBC article where my mate Jurgen is front and centre. I will explain by dissecting the article as follows.

8 These are direct quotes from the BBC article.
The text in italics is mine own.

Health Secretary Sajid Javid said it is "disappointing" at least five members of the England squad are reportedly refusing to be vaccinated.

Disappointing because people have made a different choice to that which he and his colleagues want people to make. I suppose.

His comments came after The Sun reported five players have not had the jab despite organisers of next year's Qatar World Cup planning to ban all unvaccinated players.

"I would just appeal to these people, whether they are footballers, whoever it is... that the vaccines are working. Help protect yourself and protect those around you," Javid told Times Radio.

Here, Javid is saying what the jab is doing on the one hand – but not telling people what it is doing on the other. And what it is doing on the other is one reason - it seems - why people and players are not taking the jab.

"They are role models in society. People, especially young people, I think will look up to them and they should recognise that and the difference that can make in terms of encouraging others."

This is interesting, since the government has done its best to recruit role models – including within the world of top-flight footballers – to promote the government's message. We learn that many footballers refused the government's approach – saying they will not sing its tune.

The German says he was jabbed to protect not just himself but "all the people around me".

I could actually believe Jurgen was reading from a script when he supposedly said this. Another interviewee for the BBC - John O'Looney - recently referred to such BBC scripts.

Let's assume though this was Jurgen's free choice to say this. To do something to protect other people is very noble, but to do so blindly, without doing research – for one's own comfort - some would argue is potentially being short-sighted and just a tad too trusting.

Some of these footballers it appears have done research and have not liked what they found – hence their decision to pass!.

"I got the vaccination because I was concerned about myself but even more so for everyone else around me.

"If I get it and suffer - my fault. If I get it and spread it around to everyone else - my fault and not their fault."

This appears to be a tactic straight from the manual of propaganda.

This is exactly the message the government and the BBC want to deliver to us all. Any person should feel bad that they are not doing their part – for themselves – or for others.

There is no mention of freedom of choice or – even worse – mention of the counter narrative which is only ever demonised by the BBC.

However, some people choose not to be vaccinated citing a number of factors, including their lack of confidence in the vaccine, concerns about side-effects, or a fear of needles.

This is correct. But that said, if people were truly scared about the virus, they would get the jab. But many now know that it is a virus that people recover from in 99.7% of cases - and that is if they happen to catch it in the first place. [The percentage quoted assumes that people are healthy to begin with]. So, if people actually believed the messages – which read like fearmongering propaganda – they would surely grit their teeth and get over their fear of Javid's little prick.

Part of the issue here is that Javid and his colleagues have fallen into a trap of their own making. If the government – and the BBC - point blank refuse to engage with the doubters - by answering their questions and addressing their concerns about the government's suspect narrative – then the people will start to smell a rat. And the truth appears to be, that more and more people are doing exactly that - smelling a rat.

Others - a minority - opt out of vaccination because of their consumption of misinformation and conspiracy theories online, particularly on social media.

*And here we have it – the typical BBC punchline and being...
...the reference to the misinformation and conspiracy theories.*

This – finally – is the major problem with this article and the problem with the BBC. The previously well-respected provider of terrific light entertainment and world-beating news coverage – is a mere shadow now of its former self. Nowhere has the BBC dived into the detail using its previously respected powers of investigative journalism – to get to the heart of the matter – the rock bottom as it were – in pursuit of the evidenced and indisputable truth.

Instead, the BBC use an article to promote the government's message where it cites the noble acts – if arrived at by flawed reasoning – of a high profiled sporting figure, as is my top man, Jurgen Klopp.

9 The BBC here refer to misinformation. I have poured over countless articles by the BBC and not found any which describe in detail what that misinformation is exactly – including in particular – where that misinformation comes from. Could it be that I am not the only one that has spotted the problem and can fully understand why people in their thousands are smelling a rat!

I suspect that the misinformation spoken of includes that from world renowned scientists, doctors, surgeons, pathologists, lawyers and undertakers. Among those highly qualified and respected specialists is Dr Simone Gold. Her delivery to a press conference early Oct21 – just a few days ago - I believe was missed by Jurgen.

The BBC have chosen to miss all of Dr Simone's press conferences and comments which reveal some truly jaw-dropping comments. Dr Simone is actually one of thousands of doctors and scientists who speak a completely different narrative from that posted by the BBC. To have different views in society is healthy of course. To close down the opposing views – on a different side of an argument – is not!

Dr Simone – along with countless others – speaks of her frontline medical experience of successfully treating patients compromised with the C-19 virus. The official narrative – the BBC narrative – will not speak of that success.

Why is that – you should be asking?

10 Thanks to social media – which the BBC blame for spreading the misinformation – the same people who are smelling a rat in their thousands - have seen and filmed people in their thousands at protest marches and assemblies in major cities all around the world.

If the BBC reports anything about such assemblies, they generally say two things:

1. The numbers were estimated at a few hundred
2. Some protestors were arrested for violence

Thanks to social-media, the reality of what is going on and has gone on – is in direct conflict with what old auntie is saying. The BBC reports could hardly be further from the truth. But for anyone to know this, they have to be tuned to alternative media sources. Those sources – thanks to social media – also include public-spirited lone street reporters. They are the ordinary Jo Public, equipped with a phone to record thousands of gentle folk, quietly protesting. They do this whilst trying to steer clear of the unjust police brutality – which the BBC will report on to distort the reality.

Is it any wonder why so many are ditching the BBC TV license and choosing instead to seek out the truth from other platforms? I think not – it is no wonder why so many are doing this - and I am one to have joined them.

- 11 One small but very large point to close on. The BBC mentions that old phrase “Conspiracy Theory”. Firstly, for any person that smells a rat, they start looking for a source for that smell – a theory that would explain the olfactory reaction they are detecting. If they acquire enough scientific evidence for a theory – magically – that theory turns into something quite different and quite solid. It becomes Conspiracy FACT.

It was, I understand, in the late 1960s that the term “Conspiracy Theory” first came into use. It was devised by the CIA and pushed out to the mainstream media to use. The purpose was to discount and discredit the increasing rumblings in circulation about who was really behind and to blame for the Kennedy assassination.

The strategy worked as well as it needed to at the time – although the truth has leaked out from various rat holes ever since.

The point here though, is that the most powerful weapon in the armoury chest - for those wishing to apply propaganda tactics on the uninformed, unsuspecting and normally trusting population – is the label of “Conspiracy Theory/theorists”. It is the primary weapon of choice in a propaganda offensive on the population.

- 12 Do read what Dr James says on the subject of Truth Coefficients. It is a simple method to assess the likelihood of a report being true or false. His methodology also helps detect propaganda. Interestingly, Dr James highlights another BBC article in his analysis as being a likely source of such.

- 13 Any self-respecting BBC journalist should be thoroughly embarrassed to admit they are part of an organisation that tells one sided news – and does so unashamedly.

But although I pin to the dart board the BBC - in this article about their article - do not think for a moment that the BBC are alone in this. They are just the market leaders on the subject - since all the major mainstream media platforms are following suit.

14 When enough people see through the mist which is slowly clearing - as more people question what is really happening and then join the dots presented to them, that famous old institution will be put to death - leaving space for something which rightly serves the people.

That will be a day of celebration. It will not only be the end of One-Sided reporting, but it will be the beginning of something far, far better than any of us have previously dared to even imagine happening.

These are worrying times. They are also exciting times!
